SERAP IN A COURT.

DeWolf and Lawyer Robbins Have a Scrimmage. In the replevin case of Earl B. Wil son vs. Eliza Maynard in Justice De-

Wolf's court yesterday, a judgment was remiered against the plaintiff. Attorney Robbins immediately appealed the case to the circuit court and produced bonds for the appeal. When the bonds were presented for the approval of the court the justice refused to accept them. The attorney accused the court of being partial to the interests of the defendant and that it was pursuing a course of arbitrary favoritism. This was more than the judicial mind of the justice could bear and he arose from his bench and ordered the attorney to leave his office. The attorney didn't propose to do it and the justice laid his judicial hands upon him and was about to eject him by main force. He found his match, however, in the exponent of Blackstone, who grappled him and threw him over the railing that is around the judge's desk, breaking the frame. Robbins then left the office, and, taking the bonds over to the county clerk, secured the acceptance. The suit was brought to recover possession of some furniture held by Mrs. Maynard. was rendered against the plaintiff. At-

PARIS FASHIONS

The races and coaching parties now are the occasions of the display of the rarest toilets, and by what is worn by the ladies who go is a style set.

Two new summer outdoor costumes are marvels in their way and were much admired. One is of pearl gray Japanese crape, made up over a foundation slightly wadded and sewn at intervals all over with imitation pearls. The bottom had a reversed puff, over which fell a narrow but real lace flounce, headed by a pink ribbon. The corsage was like the skirt and made without darts, and the upper part of the sleeves were of maize crepe de chine, with a finish of pink ribbon. The hat was quite directoire in gray and pink. The other toilet was of lilac faille. embroidered in pink and green around the edges, and with two narrow mose green satin ribbons sewn on flat. The inner corsage had a vest front of faille. and an open coat lined with corn colored satin. It was cut with a plain campa nella skirt. A tiny bonnet, with large imitation jewels around the brim and shaded feathers, completed the whole, with a white faille and lace parasol.

For walking dresses for early morning gray is used more than any other color, and there are many shades. Light woolens and very quietly figured China silks and satines are the materials most often employed. Por carriage, grena-dine is much seen, all covered with lace

Almost all underskirts and other underwear are made of glace or China silk, the Frenchwoman at last relinquishing the delicate white laces, ruffles and embroideries that have been a part of herself so long. The skirts are of light or dark silk, as happens to please for the

I have never seen such roses out of Newport. The wild rose, whose pink is est on the rocks where the spray wets it, has been brought by the coaxings of Newport gardeners to three and four times it roadside size. From huge blue and yellow jars it incensed the waltzers, and girls in pink and girls in white wore it at their girdles.

Miss Maud Wetmore was decked with it as she spun about with her betrothed, Mr. Barton Willing, in guise as simple as if she were not a millionaire's daughter and a sister-elect of Mrs. John Jacob Astor. Her white mull frock hung down straight and full over a slip of yellow silk, and she had a broad yelow such at her waist and yellow Watteau bows streaming from the half-low bodice behind. The roses were thrust inside the sash and pinned at her bosom, and when they faded some one pulled more for her from the jars that helped the palms and ferns to hide the Miss Celestine Stauffer, of New Onleans, whom Tilden's will made known to fame, came over from Narragansets Pier and walked a decorous square dance in a handsome gown of butter-cup bengaline figured in a dark fern green. It was in a stately princess shape, with a draped front crossing over a girdle of gold and green embroidery, which ran down the front and about the bottom. Over its coat sleeves were embroidered puffings, slashed and trimmed with bands.

Mrs. Carroll, the wife of the gov-ernor of Prince Edward Island, a newcomer at Newport, was a fine, stately matron in an iridescent grenadine that now was black, and now black and green, and now alive with sunset tinta of flesh pink and blue. A deep flat flounce of black lace was set about it almost to the waist line, puffed at the head and with black velvet rosettes set into the puffings. A narrow velvet opened down almost to it, the deep V being filled in with a great fichu of soft, creamy lace, wound and knotted, so you would think if you were not a woman, as chance happened.

Mrs. August Belmont wore black is with a white rose to relieve it, and at her side was Mrs. F. R. Newbold in a dull light green silk scattered with a faint sheeny design of quaint flowers. Her trained bell skirt was trimmed at set under a band of pale green velvet ribbon. The full bodice had a pointed correlet of green velvet with a deep lace flounce failing to the hip or below. The aleeves were made in two puffs with a frill of lace to fall over the arm, and the low corasge had a broad fichu-like frill drooping about it and meeting the corselet very nearly.

Here is where you see Newport in batistes and crinkly delaines. Here is where Newport sits on its shaded plazzas in huge beach chairs padded with crimson, and turns over all manner of light literature under honeysuckle tendrils and behind screens of rose vines.

The dominance of red is pronounced. Behind the usual coachman with the usual white breeches with their usual pale pink tops there sat yesterday afternoon a handsome woman in red and black and gold. Her cape was of Roman red bengaline, and it had a broad applique in black brightened with yellow. On her shoulders were red chiffon ruffles which ran down her back out of sight.
